'He died too young'

IDENTIFIED

Edmontonarea men killed in B.C. avalanche

All five snowmobilers killed in an immense avalanche in eastern British Columbia were from Alberta, authorities said Saturday as the local community reeled from the tragedy.

The B.C. Coroners Service released the identities of the men, ranging in age from 41 to 55, shortly after RCMP held a news conference in McBride, B.C.

The men killed were: Vincent Eugene Loewen, 52, of Vegreville; Tony Christopher Greenwood, 41, of Grand Prairie County; Ricky Robinson, 55, of Spruce Grove; Todd William Chisholm, 47, of St. Albert; and John Harold Garley, 49, of Stony Plain.

A statement on behalf of Chisholm's family said he had a passion for sledding in the mountains.

"He died too young doing what he enjoyed with his sledding buddies. Thanks to the four friends who were with Todd for their efforts," it said.

"Todd will be sadly missed by his wife of 18 years, children, mother and father, brothers and sister, extended family, friends and community."

Chisholm enjoyed fishing, hunting, camping and playing games with his children and wife, as well as music, the statement said.

Grierson said four separate groups of snowmobilers from Alberta, totalling 17 people, were caught in the avalanche path or buried to some degree, but they have all been accounted for.

Posters play a starring role here

METRO CINEMA

Independent theatre uses volunteers to sell the classics

At the Metro Cinema, the reels running through the projector are usually unique gems not seen at other theatres in town, but that's not where their flair for the original stops.

The independent cinema at the Garneau Theatre shows movies you don't see anywhere else, but they also use a volunteer army of 60 or so designers to create original designs.

Katie Sowden, the theatre's director of communications and marketing, said the posters really speak to an audience that is looking for something different.

'It's something that makes Metro unique. There is not any other movie theatre locally doing that," she said.

She said the designs — often animated or abstract nods to the movie - are a big hit with customers. "We get people asking if they can have a copy."

For the designers, working on posters can be a break from the everyday.

The variety of stuff that I get to draw is great," said Kristin Wosar, who counts The Muppets Take Manhattan and The Goonies in her portfolio. "In my job I do medical illustrations so this is a lot more fun than the interior of a pelvis."

Nadia Dzyakava said she likes to get outside her comfort zone and picks a challenge when she takes on a poster.

"I try to challenge myself and pick movies that I don't know and have never watched before, Jordan Carson, who has also done The Goonies, The Wizard of Oz, The Big Lebowski and The Rocky Horror Picture Show, said he volunteers in large part to help the Metro Cinema.

"For me it's not just about seeing my work out there, it's about making sure the work is cool and people want to see the movie and support this place," he said. Carson said the posters offer a challenge, especially when they involve common characters. He is unequivocal when asked about his biggest challenge to date.

"Space Jam — you have to get the characters exactly right, because if you don't get Bugs Bunny right every single person is going to know," he said.

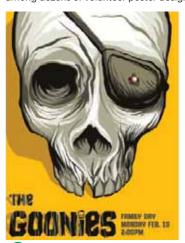

Sowden said the posters really draw people in.

"Especially when we do so many cult classics, and really classic films, it's nice to get something new that really pops out," she said. She said they have about 60 volunteer designers and will use a volunteer-contributed poster in most cases. She said for new releases it can make sense to use the film's original poster, but for the classics it makes sense to have something with a unique twist.

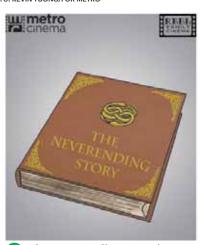

"Îf it's The Big Lebowski, everyone knows what the Dude looks like, no matter how animated or abstract he is done.'

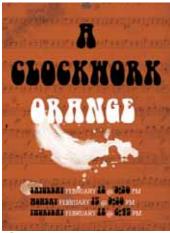

Jordan Carson, Nadia Dzyakava and Kristin Wosar hold up some of their personal favourite Metro Cinema posters. The trio are among dozens of volunteer poster designers. KEVIN TUONG/FOR METRO

EDMONTON'S WEEKLY LOOKAHEAD Daily news forecast

There's so much going on over the next week. Here's a quick look at what will be making the news over the next seven days.

In Edmonton, the youth accused in the slayings of two Mac's convenience store clerks, will appear in court to face first-degree murder and robbery charges Monday. He was 13 when he was arrested.

Also Monday, the Alberta Federation of Labour will release research on royalties, on the heels of the Alberta government's own royalty review last week. Meanwhile, Minister of Economic Development and Trade Deron Bilous will announce the government's plan to diversify the economy through the petrochemical sector.

In Toronto, former CBC broadcast celebrity Jian Ghomeshi's court trial to face four counts of sexual assault begins.

Tuesday and Wednesday

City efforts to curb shortcutting through residential neighbourhoods will be held for Ottewell

(Tuesday evening, Ottewell Community League hall), Crestwood (Wednesday evening at the community league hall) and Pleasantview (Wednesday, Ramada Edmonton South).

Meanwhile, Calgary's WestJet reports fourth-quarter and yearend earnings Tuesday. Analysts will be watching closely as the company recently announced it's cutting or reducing flights between six B.C. cities and Alberta's major airports as the downturn in oil prices weights on travel demand.

Similarly, analysts will be looking for economic forecasts withing the fourth-quarter results for Suncor Energy that come in Wednesday.

The landmark takeover offer by Suncor Energy for Canadian Oil Sands expires Friday. Suncor is looking for at least 51 per cent of COS shares to be tendered to its revised offer, which now has the support of the COS board and major shareholder Seymour Schulich. Talk of Alberta Health cuts worries medicare advocates

Jeremy Simes For Metro | Calgary

Though Alberta Health has said front-line care won't be affected when "cuts" are made to curb the growth of healthcare spending, Friends of Medicare finds such "vague" talk of cuts troubling for front-line workers.

Last week Dr. Verna Yiu, Alberta Health Services' interim president and CEO said numerous health departments within AHS would be affected by cuts to curb health-care spending.

To curb spending, Yiu said, AHS is looking at the standardization of hours, and combatting overtime and sick-time to increase full-time percentages, as labour costs make up 70 per cent of AHS' budget.

Currently, the province's average increase in health-care

Front-line care is already being stretched.

Trevor Zimmerman

costs has hovered around six per cent over the last two years. For the 2015-16 fiscal year, Yiu said she'd like that average increase to be at 2.8 per cent.

Friends of Medicare spokesman Trevor Zimmerman said AHS' plans to standardize hours and shave growth spending from all departments is worrying.

"What we're hearing is that front-line care is already stretched as it is," he said.

For Elisabeth Ballermann. president of the Health Sciences Association of Alberta, AHS needs to clarify its plans to standardize hours.

"If someone calls in sick and the hospital doesn't plan to re-fill that position because it doesn't want to pay overtime, then (Alberta Health) would not be able to legitimately say that front-line care isn't being affected," she said.

"If that's the case, then that would be a problem for patient care — workers would have to do more work that would be less thorough."

On the flip side, Ballermann said less overtime could be good for workers.

"Some work overtime because there aren't enough people, so I'm sure they'd be quite happy to not work that overtime," she said.

"It suggests they might have to hire more people to work straight time to get the same work done.'

Details of efficiencies will be made when AHS outlines its budget in February.

YOUTH FAITH DAY

Legacy of 'Father Catfish' to be recalled

Alex Boyd Metro | Edmonton

The legacy of a popular Edmonton priest who died from cancer lives on in the first annual Father Michael Mireau Youth Faith Day Monday.

Affectionately nicknamed "Father Catfish," Mireau was the district chaplain for Edmonton Catholic Schools when he died, age 42, in November Mireau's funeral was broadcast by several TV stations, and flags at Catholic schools around the city dropped to half-mast.

He was hugely popular with students and known for the YouTube videos he made to document his thoughts on everything — from current events to student issues to, finally, his struggle with can-

Filmed mostly in his office with pictures of Jesus visible alongside Darth Vader and Iron Man helmets, the videos offer a Catholic take on modern questions.

Some are serious ("How does one fit into the church if they're gay?") and some ("Do dogs go to heaven?") less so.

Nathan Kasowski, a Grade 8 student at St. Kevin Junior High, never met Mireau, but has been watching his videos in class for years. "People watch them all the time, he's probably one of the easiest priests and one of the most friendly story-telling people you'll ever know," he said.

"You can only hope to have the impact that he did, in such a short time," said Heather Kaup, principal at St. Kevin. She said his videos are still shown in religion classes across the city.

Kaup and Mireau met as children, and remained close; he sang at her wedding and baptized her children. She says his gift was always making his lessons accessible, and the enduring popularity of his videos show that.

"He called us to help each other, at the end of the day," she said. "He asked people, 'What is your passion and what are your gifts and how can you use them to help others?'

NDP introduces oil and gas system

ECONOMY

Premier says framework for royalties to ease the pain

Pent-up anxiety over changes to Alberta's oil-and-gas royalties dissipated Friday after the province revealed it's keeping the status quo for oilsands players and simplifying the system for conventional oil-and-gas wells.

A panel led by Dave Mowat, head of Crown-owned bank ATB Financial, has spent the last five months studying Alberta's royalty system — amid a worsening outlook for oil prices.

Rachel Notley's NDP government accepted the panel's recommendations.

'Our new royalty framework

Rachel Notley METRO FILE

recognizes the reality of our economy today," Notley said Friday.

"It is designed to encourage more investment and more jobs than we'd otherwise have.

Oilsands projects in their early stages pay royalty rates on gross revenues of between one and nine per cent, depending on oil prices. Once they've recovered their upfront costs, they pay whichever is higher: the aforementioned formula, or 25 to 40 per cent of net revenues, which take into account certain costs.

Mowat said the focus of the panel was less on rates and more on how to make the system work

The formula for conventional oil and natural gas wells will be changed to look more like the one for oilsands, accounting for upfront costs. The new system will take effect in 2017. Wells drilled prior to that will be subject to the existing rules for 10 years.

A flat five per cent royalty rate will be applied on those wells until their revenues equal a cost allowance, after which rates will rise.

The province will determine in the coming months how those cost allowance numbers will be crunched and is expected to announce more details before the end of March. The system is designed in such a way that companies whose costs are lower than the industry average will enjoy lower rates for longer. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Mane goal: Gender equality

FRESH IDEAS

Salon owners launching fair hair pricing

Alex Boyd Metro | Edmonton

Women have long paid higher prices for haircuts — the assumption being their hair is longer and harder to cut and style.

But that's not fair, according to the co-owners of an Edmonton salon, who as of March 1 are cutting gender-based pricing.

"We want everything to be about equality," said Jen Storey, co-owner of Adara Hair and Body Studio in Mill Creek, adding that with changing styles, the decision has been a longtime coming.

"Women have been cutting their hair short since the '50s and '60s."

Starting March 1, the Salon will have separate price ranges for long, medium and short cuts, regardless of gender, with some wiggle room for cuts that are more complex.

Under the new system cuts will range from about $37 for a shaved, or pixie cut, up to $67 for longer hair. Right now a women's cut is about $55, and a men's cut is about $35.

Rebecca Wollenberg, the other owner, said men's styles are also changing.

"A lot of men in Edmonton are becoming more conscious about their appearance," she said. "They're looking to be a bit more trendy and express themselves through their hair, which does require a lot more time and energy."

Storey said the change will also be more welcoming to transgender and non-binary customers.

Wollenberg said they've had women with short hair question why they've had to pay higher prices in the past, and the response to the new scheme has been positive.

"People are really excited that we're being really progressive"

Jen Storey, and Rebecca Wollenberg, co-owners of Adara Hair and Body Studio, won't be charging based on a customer's gender anymore, kevin tuong/for metro

DISPUTE

Entrepreneurs fight over 'night market' name

Sanam Islam Metro|Edmonton

The founder of a three-year-old business called Night Market Edmonton believes a new market has illegally taken the name. Last week, Metro reported on the Edmonton Night Market, a new project by local entrepreneur Arjun Gill.

But Trina Shipanoff, whose market runs during the summer on Jasper Avenue and 105 Street, said the name is taken.

"I have a trademark for the name 'Night Market Edmonton' for the next 15 years," Shipanoff said.

Shipanoff said she became concerned after she received several calls confusing Gill's night market with hers.

"People are going to be contacting him instead and that hurts my business."

Gill and Shipanoff have spoken, but he has refused to change the name of his business.

"We have legal documentation to prove that in the province of Alberta our business is incorporated as Edmonton Night Market," Gill said. "She's the one who's using our name illegally."

Both parties say they have contacted their lawyers and are willing to go to court to settle the dispute if needed.

"Trademark law extends to beyond just the exact name," said Robbie Nissen, a lawyer with Nissen Patent Law.

He said factors such as which party has better rights over the name and whether confusion is being caused are taken into account. If the parties don't settle, it can take years for the dispute to be resolved in court.

Deaths don't stop snowmobilers

MCBRIDE, B.C.,

Couple back on mountain very next day after tragedy

The day after a colossal avalanche killed five Alberta snowmobilers in eastern British Columbia, Thea Pelletier climbed aboard her machine and returned to the backcountry wilderness.

She unfastened a yellow plastic lily from her backpack and planted the flower in pristine snow to pay her respects.

RCMP said the snowmobilers were in four separate groups that had converged just before the slide came roaring down.

As the sun set Saturday evening, four trucks with Alberta licence plates and snowmobile trailers attached were left empty in the darkness at the foot of the Rocky Mountain range. Inside one was a pack of cigarettes and ring of faux Hawaiian flowers, hanging from the rear-view mirror. There were Tim Hortons coffee cups in another, and an Edmonton Oilers cap sat on the dash of the vehicle next to it.

By early Sunday, groups of snowmobilers prepared to leave McBride — some calling it a stressful weekend, while others believed more painful emotions would set in later.

Two men said they were heading back to the scene to retrieve the sled of their friend, who had died.

"He was a very nice guy, a family man, said Leo, who didn't give his last name, of his friend John Garley.

He said preventing future deaths required "education," but he described the scene on Friday as "just a bad situation."

Neil Petryshen, from Saskatoon, said he and his friends hadn't absorbed the loss yet, but suggested the tragedy wouldn't stop them from going out again.

"Why doesn't it stop us? There's different types of brain mentality for sledders," he said, noting they weren't into going up extreme peaks. "But the risk-takers, they want to go there. As you advance, you want to push the limits.

Pelletier, 31, and her husband were among exhilarated teams of sledders who returned to the parking lot near the mountain's base after ripping around in the mountains.

She said she'd first heard of the deaths when a news alert flashed on her smartphone.

Her first reaction was "total shock," she said. When she and her husband returned to Mc-Bride, they went to dinner at a restaurant that was packed with a sombre crowd. "It was pretty heavy in there," she said, after listening to rescuers describe pulling bodies and 12 survivors from the snow. "They were just debriefing over a beer.

But the couple still chose to head out the next morning on the mountain where the tragedy occurred.

Pelletier admitted feeling trepidation, but was confident they took proper precautions. She checked the avalanche danger rating, hung an SOS beacon from her neck, and carried a probe and shovel.

"I guess I'm a risk-taker. But you have to take calculated risks," she said.

Though she and her husband steered well clear of the avalanche site, from one vista they could still see vast cracks where snow bowls had been disturbed.

Pelletier was nowhere near the victims the day they died, but said she had often witnessed "showboating and a lot of testosterone" displayed in the male-dominated sport.

Search and rescue manager Rod Whelpton, who helped in the response, noted the deep snow made for an unpredictable situation. However, Friday's deaths would not necessarily be a future deterrent, he said. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Lead is in Canadian pipes, too: Experts

About 60,000 households have unsafe service lines

Water-toxicity experts estimate that about 10 per cent of Canadians are at risk of being exposed to lead through their drinking water as Americans in Flint, Mich., grapple with an ongoing water scandal.

Research funded by the Canadian Water Network estimates that about 60,000 households in major cities across the country still have lead service lines connecting the home to the municipal water supply.

Senior researcher Graham Gagnon says each member of those households could find themselves consuming lead.

sity, says lead service lines can also be present in smaller communities and in larger buildings such as schools. Exposure could also come about through buildings using fixtures, faucets or other components containing lead.

But Gagnon and others say Canada's cities have recognized the risks and made a concerted effort to decrease the number of lead pipes in their systems in recent years.

Gagnon believes such efforts may protect those cities from the sort of lead poisoning crisis unfolding in Flint, though he adds communities that haven't launched replacement projects

MARIJUANA REGULATIONS

Medical pot producers eye advertising rule changes

Some of Canada's biggest producers of medical marijuana want Ottawa to implement advertising regulations similar to those that govern the sale of alcohol, as they await the Liberal government's long-promised legal recreational market.

Producers are currently allowed to publish only basic information about their products, such as name and price. Active promotion is prohibited. The regulations pose a legal conundrum for companies that are anxious to market and promote their products.

Feds examine challenges of peer-to-peer transactions

Companies like Uber and Airbnb were the subject of a quiet in-depth study by high-ranking federal bureaucrats, Torstar News Service has learned.

A committee of five deputy ministers and a team of analysts undertook a comprehensive study of the so-called sharing economy and its implications for Canadian policymakers and consumers.

The study, delivered to the committee in February 2015, found significant challenges for government regulation of the notoriously slippery and everexpanding industry of ridesharing, apartment renting and other peer-to-peer transactions.

The report listed three broad areas of concern: the economy, labour and social issues and 'privacy, health and safety."

Its authors noted that Canada's social safety net - including the employment insurance and old age security systems — may need to be "redesigned" to meet the needs of sharingeconomy workers.

Likewise, the risk of unreported income from those workers could lead to tax compliance issues and a hit to social services.

But the deputy ministers were also cautioned against attempting to overregulate the industry because it could stifle the rapid innovation in the field, and because it could push the sharing economy "fully outside the government's control.' TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

You hear Adam Khan talk about himself and think America maybe isn't so divided after all.

Then you hear him talk about America. Khan, 24, is the son of a Pakistani immigrant father and a white mother. Last year, he was elected chairman of the Republican Party in a key swing county in Nevada. He is a young brown man with Muslim heritage and a supporter of gay marriage — rising fast in the domain of older white conservatives.

Republican front-runner Donald Trump, Khan said, is threatening to make the party more welcoming to bigots than minorities. His Reno-area community, meanwhile, is more politically polarized than ever.

Bombings cloud UN talks

A triple bombing killed dozens in a predominantly Shiite suburb south of the Syrian capital of Damascus on Sunday even as a UN mediator held his first meeting with opposition members to progress on humanitarian issues to end the civil war. "The Democrats blame (George W.) Bush for everything. The Republicans blame Obama for everything," he said. "And it just perpetuates the divide."

The voting phase of a rollicking presidential primary begins on Monday, when Iowa's Republicans and Democrats pack gymnasiums for their party caucuses.

It's not just that Republicans and Democrats disagree on how to solve pressing problems; they disagree on what the problems even are. They have starkly different desires about where to live and how to live.

"All the data that we have suggests that, today, things are much more polarized than they have been at any point at least over the last 80 years," said Jocelyn Kiley, associate director of research for the polling organization Pew Research.

President Barack Obama campaigned as a unifying healer. Over his seven years in office, the gulf between the parties has grown far wider — both in the way their politicians vote and in the way their supporters feel.

Republican voters press their candidates on threats to their safety and to the Constitution. Democratic voters ask theirs about the dangers of climate change and income inequality. Town halls held in the same Iowa counties sound like they are taking place in different countries.

"The divide is great," said Jeff Jorgensen, Republican chairman in Iowa's Pottawattamie County. "It's almost a divide that can't be bridged." TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

-RADIO HOST BACK IN SP

Judge may consider 'similar fact' cases as Jian Ghomeshi's trial begins Monday

Crown attorneys prosecuting sexual assault cases often present numerous individual allegations that resemble each other in the hope that a judge will determine they represent "similar fact" evidence.

"Absent evidence of collusion, you start to wonder if they are telling the same story because the accused is doing it," said John Rosen, one of Canada's leading criminal defence

Rosen, a criminal lawyer for 46 years, has no involvement in the case but was asked by the Torstar News Service to comment on the process of a criminal trial of this kind.

The trial of Jian Ghomeshi begins Monday at Old City Hall court in Toronto. Three women will testify that he sexually assaulted them (in one case, a charge of choking-overcome resistance has been added) between 2002 and 2003.

Ghomeshi has pleaded not guilty to the charges. Previously, the former Q host has said that all of his sexual activities with women have been entirely "consensual," and in a Facebook post he blamed a jilted lover (who is not part of the proceedings) for spreading lies about him.

In a trial with multiple complainants, Rosen explained that after they have told their stories under oath, the judge may be asked by the Crown to make a ruling on whether they are 'similar fact" cases. If the judge rules they are, Rosen said "that lends corroboration to the complainants.'

While an accused does not have to testify, Rosen said the presentation of three individual cases may tip the scales and encourage Ghomeshi to present his side of the story.

That's because, Rosen explained, the "Supreme Court of Canada has said that where you have a complainant who comes forward and testifies and there is no countervailing story coming from the defence, then the trial judge has to look at the credibility of the complainant." Rosen said that if there is no testimony from the accused, and "the trial judge accepts the credibility of the complainant, then it's a downward slide to conviction.'

In a sexual assault case, particularly one with no additional evidence, Rosen said it often comes down to which side is believed.

"It's an intimate event. Two people, where nobody else is around. Those two really know what happened."

He said that it can sometimes be in the best interest of the accused to testify, particularly if it appears the trial judge is accepting the credibility of the complainants.

That's when a defence lawyer may put the client on the stand.

Even if the accused's evidence just raises a reasonable doubt, the judge must acquit," Rosen said. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

SEXUAL ASSAULT CASES

Convictions 'difficult': Experts

As the trial of disgraced broadcaster Jian Ghomeshi puts the issues of consent and sexual harassment in the national spotlight this week, legal experts caution that convictions in cases of historic sexual assaults are not easy to secure.

Ghomeshi's alleged offences date as far back as 2002, and legal experts say the passing of time often poses a significant challenge to winning a conviction in such cases.

"The obvious answer is just the degradation of evidence," said Karen Bellehumeur, a former Crown prosecutor who dealt frequently with sexual assault cases. "Not only has the memory of the survivor of the abuse degraded so that peripheral details are not as clear, but also there is no longer the corroborating evidence to be investigated by police.'

Such evidence could include DNA, observations about injuries or damaged clothing, and witnesses, Bellehumeur said, noting that with little physical evidence, such cases typically boil down to a "he said, she said" scenario, especially when the accused just such a high standard of proof that it becomes very difficult," Bellehumeur said. "Unless there's a real disparity between the believability of the complainant over the accused then it's going to be very difficult for the Crown to prove a case beyond a rea-and complainants know each other. The issue of consent in those cases, she said, becomes a key element.

Ťhe main problem is that when you have a case that's just one word against the other, which tends to happen more in historic cases ... then a criminal case has sonable doubt."

One positive aspect of dated sexual assault cases, however, is that the announcement of charges against an accused can prompt other complainants to come forward, which in turn can help the prosecution, Bellehumeur added. THE CANADIAN PRESS

#PrideTapescores fundraising goal

Hockey fans across the country are showing their true colours. What started as a modest crowdfunding effort at the University of Alberta has grown into a coast-to-coast grassroots push for greater inclusivity in sports. But there's still more work to be done.

Hockey teams across North America could soon be taping up their sticks with pride after an Edmonton campaign passed its Kickstarter goal.

Pride Tape is an initiative of the Institute for Sexual Minority Studies and Services at the University of Alberta. It aimed to raise $54,000 to have 10,000 rolls of the rainbow-coloured hockey tape made.

As of Sunday afternoon, more than $70,000 had been pledged.

Kris Wells, the institute's director, said the support has been overwhelming.

That was great to see, and we have really been experiencing momentum for the Kickstarter campaign ever since the Oilers debuted Pride Tape at their skills competition," he said.

The Edmonton Oilers put the tape on their sticks during their skills competition on Jan. 24, and the team's community foundation also gave the campaign $8,000. Wells said that appearance lead to a big surge in interest.

"It just sort of went viral all over North America," he said, "The Oilers' leadership has really been pivotal in the Having surpassed the goal, Wells said the additional funds are going to help get the tape in more hands.

"We're well over what we initially hoped to raise to produce those first 10,000 rolls, so this extra funding iust allows us to increase our support."

Wells said the tape is meant to be a conversationstarter about LGBTQ issues in hockey and he's hopeful minor leagues will think about policies or practices that might make people feel more welcome in the sport.

'It has to be more than stick," he said "Our goal has been to get the product created, to get it out there and distribute, and hopefully get people talking."

Metro put out a call to readers on Friday encouraging them to have their local teams use Pride Tape, and Wells said that campaign has also lead to results.

'We have seen on social media that people are asking their team." RYAN TUMILTY/METRO

Getting him there took an incredible feat.

In Canada, only about 0.5 per cent of sexual assaults result in court proceedings. And only about 0.2 per cent end in convictions (according to calculations made from 2014 and 2013-2014 data from Statistics Canada).

In numbers: 633,000 selfreported sexual assaults in a year, compared to 1,357 convictions.

Ghomeshi no doubt has his fame, in part, to blame for his unusual fate. And we, Canadians, can thank his fame for giving us the rare chance to collectively take stock of how terribly we fail victims.

This is a national reckoning. It is a trial to spotlight how alleged abusers come in all kinds of packages - even handsome and charismatic. It will represent all the women, and some men, who do not report sexual assaults to police, because they know the odds are against them.

It will challenge us to remember that all are innocent until proven guilty. And it will force us to admit, in cases of sexual assault, that ideal, coupled with a perverse bias to believe women somehow "wanted it," has left hundreds of thousands of victims a year without justice.

we would not need this case quite so desperately.

In the fall of 2014, when support for Ghomeshi was still high and the allegations were all people could talk about, the actor Lucy DeCoutere spoke to media and put her name on the record as an alleged victim, when many were still too afraid.

"It sounds like he broke a country," she said with incredulity. "That's crazy."

It is, and it's not.

Those same statistics that make Ghomeshi's trial so exceptional also underline how many untried cases are out there; how many victims living without recourse for what was done to them. Never mind the rest of us, who are all complicit if our justice system does not mete out justice.

It's not only the low reporting rates (five per cent, compared to one-third for all crimes) and impunity. The rate of all violent crimes has fallen by nearly 30 per cent over the last decade, except sexual assaults. It's unchanged.

In other words: We're getting nowhere. Not when it comes to curbing sexual assault, or punishing it.

And so I'm grateful to the women who pressed charges against Ghomeshi, and put both him and our system on trial. Ghomeshi may be the one sitting in the chair, but today, we're all called to court.

We need to get women talking about politics

URBAN PARADIS Danielle Paradis

In the Ward 12 byelection, more than 30 candidates are running, but only five - Danisha Bhaloo, Nav Kaur, Nicole Szymanowka, Laura Thibert and Preet Toor — are women.

Why? I asked that question last Wednesday when dozens of people crammed into a room at the Mercer Tavern in downtown Edmonton for the Equal Voice Alberta North campaign launch. Equal Voice is an organization that seeks to increase the number of female candidates running.

So, again, why so few women? "Financing is one of the big issues," says Kasey Machin of EVAN, which works for gender parity on city councils and school boards.

Indeed, raising money is the reason behind the creation of EMILY's List in the U.S. (Early Money Is Like Yeast — it raises dough), and having money alleviates some of the other issues women in politics face — namely a lack of campaign staff with experience, a fundraising machine and field operations.

Another problem is role models. A lack of representation means women don't see themselves in politics, which leads to a lack of candidates and a lack of representation.

Lisa Holmes, mayor of Morinville, says she was inspired to run when she saw other women, especially young mothers, on city council.

One barrier she sees is the scrutiny women face when running for public office.

"We've seen instances of women being held to different standards, and that can scare people away," Holmes says, adding that while initially intimidating you quickly get Holmes says she likes to attend EVAN events to talk to women about running for municipal government.

"Ît's the government closest to the people, and when you see the work being done, it's just amazing," she says. "Still, scrutiny is a huge barrier — I mean, just look at the Hillary Clinton campaign in the United States and the amount of time spent discussing her pantsuits, her marriage and whether she gets a pricey haircut."

But beyond scrutiny, finances and experience, there's an issue that isn't talked about that's blocking women from politics. Simply put, women aren't often engaged in political discussions other than 'women's issues.

I've experienced a lifetime of being left out of conversations on politics. It often seems men prefer to speak to each other about politics while women are told not to discuss such things in polite company. How are people going to vote for women when they don't get to see women talking about issues - beyond fashion and weight gain? While there may not be as many women running as there are men, there are some women running, and they're all very

RSP or TFSA? How to choose

The keys to understanding the popular savings tools

Michelle Williams

Two of the most popular savings tools available to Canadians are the RSP (Retirement Savings Plan) and the TFSA (tax-free savings account). But how do you decide which option is best for you? First of all, it's important to understand the differences between them:

To tax or not to tax

"They're both tax-advantaged savings plans that are endorsed by the federal government, but with some real differences," says Kurt Rosentreter, a senior financial advisor at Manulife Securities and a chartered accountant in Toronto.

The RSP, around since 1957, was once the go-to savings plan for any Canadian looking to save for retirement. How much you can put into your RSP annually is directly related to your earned income: you can contribute up to 18 per cent of your previous year's earned income each year, which gets deducted from your taxable income at tax time. Whatever you don't use gets carried over to the following year.

"So there's room to build

Both RSPs and TFSAs have their advantages. Your choice will depend on your income and financial goals. ISTOCK significant savings for retirement," says Phil Goldband, partner at G&G Partnership in Toronto.

Though you're taxed when you withdraw your RSP savings, presumably this won't be until you're retired and your income and tax bracket are lower. As such, you're paying significantly less tax on the money when you take it out than you would have paid when you made the contribution in your higher-income vears.

In 2009, the federal government introduced the

"There is no tax deduction for your TFSA contribution like there is with an RSP contribution," explains Goldband, 'however, when the money is withdrawn, the income earned comes out tax-free.'

Unlike with an RSP, the amount you can contribute to your TFSA is not related to income. Everyone is allowed to contribute the same amount: up to $5,500 for 2016.

Making the choice

So how do you choose which of the two plans makes the most sense for your hard-earned savings?

"First, a lot depends on your income," says Rosentreter.

"The Canadian income tax system is progressive — the more you make, the higher percentage of tax you pay. The RSP offers a tax deduction for your contribution amount every year. So the higher your income, the more beneficial

For lower-income earners, the RSP tax deduction isn't worth as much, since you're not paying a high percentage of tax in the first place.

"Those with lower incomes may not be getting the bang for your buck with the RSP, so the TFSA contribution can make more sense," adds Rosen-

But it's not just about income level.

"Generally, it makes sense for young investors to put their money into TFSAs versus RSPs," Goldband says, since they can withdraw the money any time they want without being taxed on the income earned.

For expenses like a new car, a home, tuition or a medical emergency, the flexibility of a TFSA comes in handy.

However, both savings tools are designed to serve the same goal: saving for retirement. To that end, the choice doesn't have to be between one and the other. Young and old investors alike would be wise to look at both plans and consider the advantages each one offers.

"If someone has ample cash flow, they may want to consider maximizing both the RSP and TFSA contributions each year," suggests Rosentreter.

Will Annick and Yolanda's financial goals be met? Metro's finance guru Lesley-Anne Scorgie has only 10 weeks left to tackle the women's largest financial burdens and teach them to allocate resources.

Swimming in student debt

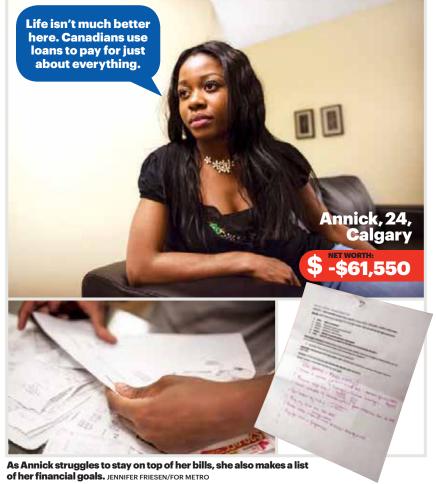

THE CHALLENGE: Metro's finance guru Lesley-Anne Scorgie has 10 weeks left to get Annick, 24, and Yolanda, 27, to change their spending behaviours and build a nest egg while meeting their financial obligations. This week we focus on Annick.

THIS WEEK: Annick immigrated to Canada in 2010, finished her undergraduate degree in Energy Management at the University of Calgary, and now works as a property management administrator making $35,000 per year. She's on a mission to crush her consumer debt within six months and save a $25,000 down payment through her RRSP over the next five years.

NEXT WEEK: Yolanda learns there is such a thing as being too frugal! She is depriving herself of the small things in life that would make her happy, and must learn to build herself a "pillow" and stick to a budget so she doesn't binge shop.

LESLEY-ANNE SCORGIE IS A BESTSELLING AUTHOR AND FOUNDER OF MEVEST, A MONEY COACHING SERVICE FOR CANADIANS. FOLLOW HER @LESLEYSCORGIE

THE STORY

When Annick arrived to Canada from the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), she had high financial hopes. But today she joins thousands of underemployed new graduates in Alberta's tough economy. Compared to the DRC, "Life isn't much better here. Canadians use loans to pay for just about everything. Then they can't afford anything," says Annick.

Weighted down by credit card balances and student loans, Annick recently qualified for repayment assistance through Canada Student Loans, buying her six months of low principle payments of $150 per month. She took another drastic financial step, applying for rent relief through her landlord. This request would reduce her monthly rent to $1,200 from $1,400. She splits this cost with her roommate.

THE LESSON

It's hard to see the light at the end of the tunnel of debt, but Annick's going to use the 60/60/60 plan. Every 60 days she will eliminate another debt, starting with her loans from friends and family because those are loaded with financial and personal anxiety. She'll use money from her second job, $450 per month, to eliminate those quickly.

She'll then move on to her taxes followed by her credit cards. While implementing the 60/60/60 plan, she'll continue to make regular minimum payments on

Gail Vaz-Oxlade For Metro Canada

One of the questions I often get from people who have watched my show is, "Are those people for real?" quickly followed by, "Don't they know they have to save something?"

Yes, the people on my show are very real; I took great pains to keep the "reality" in reality TV. And, no, people don't really think they have to save. Some think government benefits will be enough. (That may be true if you're comfortable living on about $18,000 a year.) Others say they just can't find the money to save.

Life is expensive. I know. But saving is important. Thirty or so years ago we knew that and we saved as much as 18 per cent of our income. Since then our savings rates have plummeted. Now, on average, we're saving about five percent of our money. But that's an average; some of us are saving nothing at all.

And then there are the folks who think that as long they're stashing money away in RRSPs, TFSA or CSBs, they're doing fine. Never mind that the balances on their overdrafts, lines of credit or credit cards keep going up, they've got an automatic savings plan in place so they're okie dokie.

What they are is delusional. To be saving, you must be net positive, meaning that you must be putting away more money than you're taking on in debt. If this year you sock away $10,000 in a TFSA but you rack up $6,000 on your line of credit, $3,500 on credit cards and $500 in over-draft, you've saved absolutely nothing.

Saving is the act of taking money out of your cash flow and putting it away a date to be named later. Putting $50 a month away in savings and spending $50 on credit that you're not paying off in full when the bill comes in is not saving. You're pretending to save.

You know the story of the grasshopper and the ant. Grasshoppers don't plan; ants do. Grasshoppers love their toys; ants love their freedom of choice. Grasshoppers compare themselves to others; ants measure how close they are to reaching their goals. So, are you a grasshopper or are you an ant?

If you answer "grasshopper" all is not lost. Just because you're not an ant doesn't mean you'll never be a saver. You're just going to have to try harder to overcome your natural tendency to have a great time and not think about tomorrow.

If you want to become a saver, focus on making small, manageable changes that will stick. Don't give up coffee completely. Just decide that you're going to trim back your coffee habit by 30 per cent a week and send all the money you're not spending on your caffeine habit to a high interest savings account.

Like to hit the fast-food outlets or drive-through windows? Every time you grab a burger or a coffee, drop a buck in a can you keep in your car. Hey, if you can find the money for the fast food, you can find the money to save too.

JOHANNA SCHNELLER WHAT I'M WATCHING

A thaw in chilly Mr. Robot

THE SHOW: Mr. Robot, Season 1, Episode 7 (Shomi) THE MOMENT: The Shrug

Security expert Angela (Portia Doubleday) is seated in the tasteful study of corporate honcho Terry (Bruce Altman), making a deal: she'll fix his legal woes, if he describes what happened in a boardroom 20 years ago when he and other executives decided to ignore the treatment of hazardous waste in her township. He complies, nonchalantly.

So you were drunk, eating shrimp cocktail, and it was raining when you decided my mother would die?" she asks. He looks at the ground.

"Did any of it ever give you, or anyone, pause?" she asks.

"Yeah. Sure," he replies. "But then you go home, and you have dinner. And you wake up the next morning." He shrugs. That shrug, with all it implies, is the first moment of this series that made me feel real emotion. Oh, it's a fascinating show - brainy, original, well-made. But baby, it's chilly.

It revolves around the interior monologues of Elliot (Rami Malek, excellent, both vulnerable and scary), a brilliant hacker with social anxiety disorder, who disdains people for not seeing what he sees: that we've signed our lives away to sneering corporate overlords. He plots with Mr. Robot (Christian Slater), an anarchist, to bring the system down. (Again with the villainous super-rich! They're everywhere!)

Interior monologues are supposed to pull a listener in give us insights, make us empathic. Elliot's are clever and full of truths. But because they're more about shadowy conspiracies than about illuminating Elliot's soul, they keep me at a distance. I admire them. But I don't feel them.

Céline back in Vegas

Just weeks after Céline Dion lost her husband René Angélil and older brother Daniel to cancer, the pop superstar will soon return to work.

A celebration of Angélil's life is slated to take place in Las Vegas on Wednesday, and after having little time to mourn privately, Dion is scheduled to resume her residency at The Colosseum at Caesars Palace on Feb. 23.

Angélil had been battling a recurrence of throat cancer, which he was first diagnosed with in 1998. He had three sons with Dion, who took a year-long hiatus to care for him before he died.

But even for those like Dion who know the loss of their spouse is imminent, the experience isn't any less painful when their partner dies — an experience Carole Brody Fleet knows all too well.

MINISERIES

Lily James plays War and Peace heroine

Many people find the idea of reading Leo Tolstoy's War and Peace to be daunting, but not Lily James.

When she was cast as Natasha in a miniseries based on the novel, she was working on a live action remake of Cinderella directed by Kenneth Branagh, who told her, "Reading War and Peace will be one of the great joys of your life."

"He is right," said James in a recent interview. "It is the most beautiful, wonderful story ever told, I think."

War and Peace, also starring James Norton and Paul Dano, is being broadcast on A&E. Part 3 debuts Monday. James, 26, says she "really just used the book like a bible. I carried it around with me everywhere. I was scribbling and writing down all the bits about Natasha that I loved. Every time she turned up on a page, my heart would start beating faster."

The miniseries introduces viewers to Natasha as a 13-year-old girl who is "very young, very open, very naïve, very spirited." The miniseries spans 15 years and James says she most enjoyed playing an older Natasha.

"The second half of Natasha's journey was what I was really drawn to," she said.

"She's this really tragic heroine ... And she goes to such depths of despair and punishment. She punishes herself for the choices she makes and in such an extreme way, and I've never dealt with material like that before so it was a real challenge.

again in her next film, Pride and Prejudice and Zombies, opening Feb. 5. It's based on the novel by Seth Grahame-

"I was very confused when I found out they were putting zombies into Jane Austen," said James. "It's the true, classic story but set in this zombie apocalyptic world and that does wonderful, weird and terrifying things. . . . I challenge anyone to go and not have fun."

James is best known for her role of the romantic, fun-loving Cousin Rose on Downton Abbey, now airing its final season on PBS's Masterpiece.

Creator "Julian Fellowes is a genius," she said. "How he has woven his web of stories and characters, and kept people wanting more and following in love with the characters, he doesn't let you down. (Fans) won't be disappointed with the series' conclusion."

Scott steals the show Djokovic romps

Unlikely all-star scores pair of goals, named tourney MVP

John Scott sat on his teammates' shoulders while fans chanted "M-V-P! M-V-P!" and the NHL finally got out of the way.

The people spoke up for Scott once again Sunday night, making the career journeyman enforcer an all-star MVP as a write-in candidate after voting him into the new 3-on-3 all-star tournament as captain of the Pacific Division.

Scott scored twice during the tournament, bringing cheers from fans and smiles from teammates who relished every moment along with the gentle giant and his goofy grin. Scott led the Pacific to a 1-0 win in the championship.

"It's just another one on the list of stuff that I cannot believe is happening," Scott said of being picked as MVP. "I never in a million years would have believed I was at an all-star game, the fans would be behind me like that and score two goals in a game. You can't put it into words. You can't write this stuff. It's unbelievable."

Now Scott's helmet is headed to the Hockey Hall of Fame in Toronto, and his name was trending on Twitter in the United States after a night when he wasn't listed among the three MVP candidates for a social media vote late in the final game.

The NHL did not release details, but fans took it upon themselves to select him once again, in an overwhelming vote for the six-foot-eight forward with five goals in 285 career

John Scott was cheered all weekend long in Nashville. BRUCE BENNETT/GETTY IMAGES

"I'm sure he won over a lot of people, and got even more fans," Chicago forward Patrick Kane said of Scott.

Fans at Bridgestone Arena booed the MVP options when announced and yelled for Scott, who wrote last week that someone with the NHL tried to talk him out of coming. He seemed a bit stunned as he soaked everything in, from teammates lifting him on their shoulders while fans chanted "MVP!" before Scott was announced as the winner and presented with a Honda Pilot Touring SUV. He also posed with teammates behind their $1 million check.

The NHL changed the format after last year's all-star game featured 92 shots and a combined

SKILLS COMPETITION HIGHLIGHTS

Red Wings forward Dylan Larkin won not only the title of fastest skater at this event but set the record for the fastest lap around a full rink. He topped Mike Gartner's time of 13.386 seconds in 1996 — months before Larkin was born.

- Hometown favourite Predators captain Shea Weber won the hardest-shot at 108.1 m.p.h.
- P.K. Subban channeling his inner Jaromir Jagr with a long-flowing wig — won the breakaway event — decided by Twitter fan voting.

29 goals for the biggest offensive display in the showcase's 60-year history. This time, these all-stars combined for 116 shots and 23 goals.

This event looked much more like the hockey the league plays the rest of the season. Their inspiration was the 3-on-3 overtime approach for a tournament pitting the four divisions against each other in 20-minute games. The winners of the first two games advanced to a thirdperiod championship.

"I broke a better sweat than last year for sure," Philadelphia Flyers and Metropolitan Division forward Claude Giroux said.

Anaheim forward Corey Perry scored the lone goal in the championship game at 3:38 of the second period. Two 10-minute periods were played in each of the three games.

Bettman sticking it out until 2022

Gary Bettman GETTY IMAGES

Gary Bettman said his relationship with the union has never been better.

Perhaps that's why he is willing to stick around as NHL commissioner into the next decade.

Bettman signed a contract through 2022, he confirmed in an interview Sunday on the NHL Network before the allstar game.

"This happened many, many months ago," Bettman said. He has been the league's leader since 1993 when it had 24 teams. Now, it has 30 franchises and there may be one or two more in a couple of years.

After Bettman's state-of-theleague news conference Saturday, he said the World Cup of Hockey and the 3-on-3 format for overtime and the all-star game are "great examples" of how well he and NHL Players' Association executive director Don Fehr are getting along.

"Don has brought stability and strength to the union, and that's a good thing," Bettman said. "He's been a good working partner. That doesn't mean we agree on everything, but we're communicating well and working things out.

Novak Djokovic maintained his perfect streak in six Australian Open finals with a 6-1, 7-5, 7-6 (3) victory Sunday that consigned Andy Murray to a fifth defeat in championship deciders at Melbourne Park.

Djokovic equalled Roy Emerson's long-standing record of six Australian Open titles and increased his career haul to 11 Grand Slam titles, including four of the last five, to join Rod Laver and Bjorn Borg at No. 5 on the all-time list.

"First of all I need to pay the respect to Andy and his team. Tough match, tough luck tonight," Djokovic said. "You're a great champion, great friend, very committed to this sport. I'm sure in the future you're going to have many opportunities.
